National Severe Weather Warning Service

Chief Forecasters Assessment
A series of low pressure systems will bring mild and moist air to Wales along with strong winds. This will lead to some large rainfall accumulations: 60 to 80 mm may fall fairly widely over the two days, and perhaps more than 120 mm over the highest ground. Whilst lowland areas are expected to see smaller rainfall amounts, localised flooding is still quite possible as the water moves downstream through the rivers; indeed some rivers may continue to rise on Wednesday, despite the rainfall easing.

There is still some uncertainty around the behaviour of individual weather systems and so also regarding the persistence of the rainfall. Further updates are likely in the coming days.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 06:15 on Mon, 30th Nov 2015 until 23:45 on Tue, 01st Dec 2015

Rain is expected to move northwards across Wales from early Monday, with the largest rainfall totals across high ground. This will persist, especially over the hills, through Monday and Tuesday, though varying in intensity. With this rain following a wet November, particularly over North Wales, the ground is saturated and rivers are expected to rise in response.

This is a further  update, to remove Flintshire from the warning area, to delay the start time and to adjust the expected amounts and impacts. Please be aware of the potential for disruption from flooding.
